

Name: _____

Date: _____

Counseling

Across

5. In this stage of grief the patient or family may try to make a "last ditch" attempt to make the diagnosis go away

8. This stage of grief is an attempt to reject a frightful and painful reality

10. In this stage of grief the client reaches an understanding of the disability and expends energy towards resolution

11. This process has a series of steps the patients and caregivers may go through that explain their emotions

12. When listening for _____, the clinician not only listens to the surface expressions but also listens for the meanings that underlie the spoken messages

13. In this stage of awareness, patients and caregivers are still at the point of refusing to recognize the diagnoses or abnormality

14. _____ requires the listener to remove any distractions from the immediate environment

Down

1. In this stage of awareness, clients and caregivers who are partially aware of the client's problems begin to describe symptoms to the clinician and often ask questions

2. When listening _____, the clinician avoids imposing his or her personal attitudes, feelings, and beliefs on the patient or family members

3. A counseling clinician who need to remain alert during the counseling process is using

4. In this stage of awareness, patients and caregivers recognize the disability and its potential influence

6. This stage of grief the belief is that the impairment is punishment for something the patient has done

7. This stage of grief could be described as "anger turned inward"

9. This stage of grief could be someone who is resentful and asking "why me?"